Twenty-nine people spent this cloudy green morning on the campus of the University of Arizona. Each of the control locations was a tree or bush with an identifying sign. I was very pleased that there were no problems with the course, but that even better, people enjoyed the arboretum theme and the beauty of the campus.

Most of us who spend time on campus are usually rushing across thinking of classes. When we slow down, the graceful design of the campus can be appreciated. Different approaches to landscape architecture were emphasized during different decades. History at (<http://arboretum.arizona.edu/documents/ArboretumHistory.pdf>)

The campus itself is an arboretum (<http://arboretum.arizona.edu/>) with plant walks organized around themes like Great Trees of Arizona or Medicinal Plants (<http://arboretum.arizona.edu/plantwalks.html>).

Our map of the campus is excellent. Detail is so fine that you can discern areas you can pass through even though they are roofed. There are many features you might not expect to find – like the number of ponds on campus. After being on campus for decades as a student and professional, I especially find it interesting when running with the map to have memories of previous layouts of the campus springing to mind as I plan my route. The campus, even areas built a century ago, are still constantly changing – thus the out-of-bounds area I had to add to Sunday's map.

This excellent map should be in heavy rotation on the club schedule. Many more themes could be exploited using wonderful elements on campus- sculptures, for example. And I didn't come close to using all the trees! If you are considering giving course setting a try, I recommend this excellent, flat, easy to reach, feature-filled map for your maiden voyage.
